I write to elaborate on how I was awarded a master's degree by first dissecting the methods used to complete my thesis work. With a deep passion for finding the best leadership skills during the pandemic, I reviewed my business interests and looked for the best university to make my dream come true. In this endeavor, I was interested in Buckinghamshire New University, which emerged and aligned with my interests.

In order to make my dream come true, I piloted a thorough application process recommended by relevant documents, including gathering the requisite documents such as academic transcripts and letters of recommendation from companies I had worked for before. During the application, I wrote a compelling statement of purpose comprehensively highlighting my academic journey and goals. I believe that such documents helped me join the master's education.

I began this crucial journey by first looking for the connection between leadership, organizational performance, and the various problems the pandemic caused worldwide. This passion for looking for new information drove me to the online libraries and field study observation collection of data related to this topic. In this reflection letter about what transpired, I must mention that I benefited from my consultations with professors such as Professor Dr. A. S. and Dr. P. D.. Such resourceful people guided me on the kind of literature reviews to rely on to acquire relevant information about my topic. Hence, I relied on the scholarly articles updated annually. From these articles, I began a deep and comprehensive research plan to explore the influence of leadership attributes, styles, and strategies on organizational resilience following the outbreak of the COVID-19 crisis.

My dissertation's main pillar activity was carrying out a comprehensive study of the literature written by other credible authors. This required me to fully immerse myself in various leadership frameworks, analyze a range of viewpoints regarding the pandemic's effects on business failure, and thoroughly examine the case study of F.L. This regional airline encountered numerous problems caused by the crisis and was later declared bankrupt. The case exposed various effective leadership strategies and how they failed to rescue the company in the pandemic crisis. Hence, relying on the specific cases, I made valid arguments for the thesis, which could be reflected in real-life examples of companies affected by the crisis.

During the research, I was able to apply the holistic research methodology, such as non-probability sampling of data technique, which was pivotal. The research data I collected was about administering a self-administered questionnaire to the relevant participants. I consulted through interviews and questionnaires the colleagues and friends assuming leadership roles across diverse settings of businesses during the pandemic. These answers and insights provided valuable perspectives on leadership's role in organizational performance during crisis times.

After analyzing the collected data about the topic, I brought various crucial patterns and trends to light. This highlighted the pivotal role of leadership skills during the pandemic, such as effective of leadership skills during the pandemic, such as effective communication, the ability to adapt to changes, and coordination skills that could help companies and businesses survive and make profits. Also, my master's thesis found that the transformative and situational leadership styles were the most applied and led to successful operations during the pandemic.

My master's education, supported by the successful thesis I wrote, marks my academic consistency and dedication to joining the field of business administration and making a difference by applying the collected data to practice. I see my success in my thesis and master's education as an initial step to embrace complex changes, sail through the ambiguity of the pandemic, and hence apply resilience to drive change in challenging circumstances.
